Due to blizzard impacts, RTD bus and rail service remains suspended through the morning commute

One exception is the University of Colorado A Line, resuming service at 3:15 a.m. today

DENVER (March 15, 2021) – The Regional Transportation District (RTD) is suspending all bus and most rail services through the morning commute today due to poor conditions resulting from the weekend snowstorm. All Access-a-Ride service is also suspended.

One exception is the University of Colorado A Line, beginning at 3:15 a.m. today between Denver Airport Station and Union Station to accommodate airport operations. Service will be on a half-hour frequency. No light rail or bus connections will be available at stations along the line until further notice.

The agency made the decision for the safety of its customers and employees. RTD staff will evaluate the situation throughout the morning to determine when it is safe to resume service. The agency will communicate this information as soon as it is available.

Safety is RTD's top priority, and the agency's ultimate goal is to get everyone safely to their destinations.
